GLORIA BORGER

Gloria Borger is CNN's senior political analyst, appearing regularly across all CNN dayside and primetime platforms, including The Situation Room with Wolf Blitzer, The Lead with Jake Tapper, and AC360 with Anderson Cooper. She also plays a pivotal role in covering elections and other breaking news.

In April of 2023 Borger was honored with the Hall of Fame achievement award by Washington Women in journalism.

Borger has reported documentaries and long form pieces for CNN, including the two-hour election profiles of now President Joe Biden, former president Donald Trump, and GOP nominee Mitt Romney. She also reported the award winning and Emmy-nominated documentary pieces, "The Odd Couple," on lawyers Ted Olsen and David Boies, who joined together—after being on opposite sides of the Bush v Gore case in 2000—to shepherd gay marriage to the Supreme Court. And she also reported the well-received documentary "Almost President: The Agony of Defeat," which profiled former presidential candidates who described what it was like to live through a failed presidential campaign—perhaps the greatest public failure in American political life.

In addition to documentaries, Borger's pieces also include a look at the first hundred days of the COVID-19 vaccine; a portrait of Rep. Bennie Thompson, chair of the January 6 committee; and a piece on Eric Adams as he was becoming mayor of New York, to name a few.

Before joining CNN in September 2007, Borger was CBS News' national political correspondent and a contributor to CBS's Face the Nation, 60 Minutes II and the network's special events coverage. From 2002 to 2004, she was the co-anchor of CNBC's Capital Report. Borger began her professional career as a reporter at The Washington Star where she covered politics and co-authored a daily serial, eventually published as a book, Federal Triangle, a parody of political life in Washington. Borger was a political columnist for U.S. News & World Report and chief congressional correspondent for Newsweek. Early in her career, Borger was awarded the Watson Traveling Fellowship to study the British press.

Borger graduated from Colgate University in Hamilton, N.Y., where she has served on the board of trustees.
